The selectmen of Boston, chosen at the annual town meeting, met frequently to take care of the town business. They concerned themselves with such matters as setting the standards for a loaf of bread, staffing the fire companies, leasing town land and buildings, monitoring the arrival of new residents, administering charity and any other matters relating to the health and welfare of the inhabitants.

Contained within the minutes of their meetings is a wealth of information of both historical and genealogical interest. In some cases stories unfold which personalize those events now reported in every elementary school history text. They discuss, for instance, the need to protect the tea due to arrive in the harbor in late 1773. They admonish the tea's consignee, who subsequently disappears. They administer the fund established for the man who lost his arm 'in the late massacre' and complain about local sailors imprest by Captains of His Majesty's warships.

It was, however, largely routine business which occupied the agenda of the meetings so faithfully recorded by the Town Clerk. Some of these repeated events or concerns which provide genealogical data are described below.

The Walk of the Town: Early each year the Selectmen, accompanied by the Overseers of the Poor, the Representatives to the Provincial Court and other dignitaries made a 'General Walk or Visitation' of the town. The names of the fifty to one hundred invitees to this annual inspection tour are recorded in the minutes.

The visitation of the schools: An inspection of the public schools was conducted each June, with the invitation list including the town's ministers, the Justices of the Peace and other notables. These invitations were also recorded in the minutes.

Licenses: Petitions for liquor licenses, either as Retailer or Innholder, were acted upon annually. A person disapproved for a license could appeal the decision, or reapply the following year. In some cases several years of denial are followed by approval.

Smallpox: Among the recurring concerns of the selectmen was the containment of contagious disease. In 1736 Spectacle Island in Boston Harbor was the designated hospital and quarantine island, and ships arriving with smallpox or other disease were held there until all passengers and crew had either recovered, died, or could prove they were not liable to infection. Later the town purchased Rainsford Island for the same purpose, constructed several hospital buildings and staffed them with a full time attendant.

Townspeople who contracted smallpox and their households were segregated from the rest of the population, either by sending the entire family to a hospital, or by erecting barricades around the house, hanging a red flag and posting guards to prevent entry or exit.

Building Permits: Residents who wished to construct or repair drainage lines from their homes to 'the common shore' or sewer, those who wished to build wooden buildings in high fire risk areas, or construct outbuildings on their land, or put posts or fences in front of the house, required permission from the selectmen. These requests for permissions were recorded in the minutes.

Ticket Porters: Ticket Porters, or carters, were licensed by the town and their rates publicly posted. There were about twenty such porters in Boston ca. 1760.

Warning Out: Among the more familiar concerns of the selectmen are the 'warnings out'. Residents were required to report any visitor, including family members, who remained in the town longer than a few days. Unless these Strangers could show sufficient means to support themselves, or produce a bondsman who would promised to reimburse the town for any charge to the town incurred by that person, they were warned to depart the town, and the warning recorded in the town records. This 'warning out' prevented any later claim against the town for the support of that person, should he 'fall into low circumstances ' and require public assistance. Inhabitancy conferred legal rights, and was granted only if the petitioner could show he was capable of supporting himself and his family. An individual who resided within the town for more than one year and had not been warned out, however, was considered an inhabitant by default, and obligated the town to pay any public assistance required. If a warning out had been recorded, the person would become a charge of his prior town of residence, or of the Province. The often used phrase, a 'Stranger and not an inhabitant of any town in the Province' signifies that the cost of public assistance cannot be charged to any town, but will become a cost of the Province. To contain its ballooning welfare costs, Boston employed several men to search out and report all strangers. Captains of ships were deemed responsible for their passengers, and were required to post bond or take back those with questionable means of support.

Conventions: This book contains extracts of data of genealogical interest from those Selectmen's meetings held between September 1736 and April 5, 1775. Variant spellings of surnames have been retained as they appear in the record, but have been grouped together under one heading, with individual entries listed alphabetically by first name. Notes and comments of the author are enclosed in brackets. Dates in the left hand column always refer to years in the 1700's. The dates referenced are the dates of the selectmen's meeting, and not necessarily the date of the event.

Genealogical Data Extracted from the Boston Selectmen's Minutes 1736-1775

Brigitte Burkett

The Selectmen of Boston, chosen each year at the Boston town meeting, met frequently to take care of the town business. The Town Clerk faithfully recorded the minutes of these meetings, rich with historical and genealogical information. Some of the concerns occupying the agenda were staffing the fire companies, leasing town land and buildings, and monitoring the arrival of new residents. They discussed the need to protect the tea due to arrive in the harbor in late 1773. They also administered the fund established for the man who lost his arm 'in the late massacre,' and complained about local sailors put into impressment by Captains of His Majesty's warships. The largely routine business covered in each meeting provides important genealogical data such as the participants in the 'General Walk or Visitation' of the town, the inspectors of the schools, names of those requesting liquor licenses and building permits, smallpox victims, and 'Strangers.' These minutes contain all of the town business for the years 1736-1775. The events are listed in alphabetical order according to the name of the person involved.
